Abstract The present investigation studies the levels of emotional intimacy within nonclinical single-parent families and intact families, and how these may relate to children's academic, social and emotional adjustments. Participants were 94 children of divorced families, 95 children of intact families, and their mothers (60 married and 58 divorced). The inventory of family feelings (IFF) and Kvebaek family sculpture technique (KFST) were used to examine subjects' emotional relationships with their family members. The results show significant differences between the divorced and intact groups on several measures of intimacy and adjustment. Most of these differences, however, are found to be small (as reflected by their small size effect). The only exception is with regard to the children's feeling of intimacy with their divorced noncustodial father. The quality of this dyad relationship also has a predictive power for the children's p

Locating Full Text

There are several options for locating the full text of this article electronically or in print. This article already has a Full-Text link (not all records will have this).

You can also try the 360 Link to Full Text. If WSU Libraries owns this article online in another database, 360 Link will take you directly to it.

If those options don't lead you to full text, try Check Your Library. The program will search the WSU Libraries Catalog for the journal that this article appeared in (in this example, Educational Psychology). WSU may have the article online or in print.

Finally, if WSU Libraries does not have this article available in any format, you can try WSU Interlibrary Loan. The library will then try to get the article for you from another library.
